Is Career Development Relevant?

Most months, when I search for a topic that requires awareness I can reflect on the emails and information I receive. This month, I cannot ignore the impact government cuts have on educational programs.

Outside of our time spent sleeping (~1/3 of our entire life); more time is spent working in a career than anything else. Statistically, it isn't even close. However, the training we all receive for this important part of our lives seems to sometimes get overlooked. Our foundational skills we develop during our K-12 academic experiences are crucial for the readiness required during this lengthy time in life. All of the formal education children receive by law until the age of 18 can be called "Career Development". It is not a class, a discussion, an adviser period, or program students work through. It's a complete package that comes with the training students receive across all grades. It includes the conversations at home and the role-models in their lives.

Is Career development relevant? It absolutely is relevant and necessary to provide the training required to hopefully bring enjoyment, satisfaction and prosperity during the most dominant time of life. I personally cannot think of anything more relevant.
